A Place Called Robertson

By Tony Williams and Anna Hewgill
Four Donkey Films

72 mins | Feature Documentary |
Robertson NSW 2013 | Music by
Andrew Ford and Stephen Fearnley

Tony Williams and Anna Hewgill spent three years immersing themselves in the NSW town of Robertson, to create a documentary about rural life in a small village. A Place Called Robertson is an exuberant and whimsical film that takes an affectionate look at the characters who live in a unique Australian country town. The values of these often quirky old-timers rub off on the newcomers who are seeking a tree change. And the new residents discover there is more to Robertson than just trees.

"Everybody wants to feel part of a community don't they, they want to feel that they belong"
- Heather Tait, (former) Robertson resident.

The film stars a cast of characters from the Robertson community and features Elegy in a Country Graveyard by Andrew Ford.

A Place Called Robertson will be introduced by Tony Williams

And There's More!

Prior to the main feature there will be two short films by Spud Productions made in 2006 as part of a CTC Robertson/Metroscreen community project funded by Regional Arts.

Farmer Gumboot (3 mins) is a claymation with an environmental message directed by Penny Osterhaus with a group of young animators. Penny is also one of the stars in Whispers in the Mist (5 mins) - what happens when rumours start in town about the Big Potato.....
